U. S. Chief Justice Dedicates Kennedy Memorial In Israel In Informal Atmosphere Of Official Guests, Students, Tourists, Among Throngs

A memorial to President Kennedy was dedicated in an informal atmosphere atop a barren but historic hill outside Jerusalem. Nearly 2,000 official guests, including many from the United States, were joined by hundreds of enthusiastic American students and tourists, says James Feron, of the New York Times, as well as throngs of Israelis in the small plaza facing the memorial.

Chief Justice Earl Warren, of the United States Supreme Court, whose enthusiasm for the dramatic memorial, after he had seen it for the first time, was such that he redrafted his dedicatory speech, praised the striking symbolism, a tree trunk representing untimely death. It was designed by David Reznik.

Justice Warren also said that the Kennedy Peace Forest planted on the slopes of the memorial hill, would have "greatly pleased" the young President. "Something more than mere surmise justifies my statement," Justice Warren said.

He recalled Mr. Kennedy's words in a speech eight years ago when the then junior Senator from Massachusetts told a Jewish National Fund meeting: "What work could be more heartwarming or more enduring than the great forest at Jerusalem? Your children and grandchildren when they visit Israel will find your monument."

Now they will also find a monument to Mr. Kennedy, dedicated on a July 4 with dignity and affection by Israeli and American leaders before thousands who seemed to relish the occasion. At times the milling throng lent a picnic atmosphere to the event.

The Jewish National Fund, which raised money for the memorial in the United States, posted general invitations in hotels. In addition, hundreds of young Americans who are studying and touring in Israel made their way to the site.

The memorial is five miles from the nearest regular bus at the end of a winding road leading through two moshavim, or communal settlements. Several miles southwest of Jerusalem's outskirts and standing atop the highest hill in the vicinity, says the New York Times, the memorial overlooks a border valley containing the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem railway and the Jordanian village of Bittir.

This is the site of ancient Betar, the last stronghold of Simon Bar Kochba's revolt against the Romans in A.D. 132-135. The Jewish army of insurrection, numbering 200,000, fought the Roman legions until overwhelmed on these slopes.

To open the proceedings a children's band played "Hatikva," the Israeli national anthem, and then made a valiant attempt at "The Star-Spangled Banner." The American anthem, played slowly by the children, was picked up by strong voices until the music swept the audience.

Speaker after speaker standing before the sturdy monument, which was designed by the Israeli architect, David Reznik, drew attention to its symbolism and to the significance of the growing trees around it.

Jacob Tsur, world president of the Jewish National Fund, said it had been "conceived in the shape of a mighty trunk of a fallen tree, among the thousands of saplings which will grow one day into a great forest."

Walworth Barbour, the American Ambassador to Israel, recalled that Mr. Kennedy had said: "A nation reveals itself not only by the men it produces but also by the men it honors, the men it remembers."

"In thus honoring and remembering the late President Kennedy," Mr. Barbour said, "the men and women of the Jewish National Fund honor themselves — beyond and above the glory they have already earned in their work for Israel."

Justice Warren observed that Washington had "more than its share of edifices in stone and bronze," but he paid special tribute to what he described as the "living memorial" being planted for Mr. Kennedy in Israel.

Justice Warren said that Mr. Kennedy had "a very special feeling for this nation and an unwavering confidence in its future." He added that Mr. Kennedy visited Israel first in 1939 when it was still a British mandate, says the New York Times. He next came in 1951 and Justice Warren spoke these words that Mr. Kennedy had used on that occasion:

"Perhaps the greatest change of all I found in the hearts and minds of the people. For, unlike the discouraged settlers of 1939, they looked to the future with hope. I found a revival of an ancient spirit."

Head Of World Union For Progressive Judaism Castigates Soviet For Indefensible Treatment Of Jews

Rabbi Jacob K. Shankman, president of the World Union For Progressive Judaism, called upon the Soviet Union to end the "suppressions" against its three million Jews and to lift the restrictions which prevent the availability of adequate tools for their religious and cultural survival.

Keynoting the six-day 14th convocation of the International Liberal Synagogue body at Guildhall, Rabbi Shankman asked that the group make direct representation to the USSR to express its deep concern for the plight of Russian Jews and "raise our voice in the tribunals of nations and speak before the liberal forums of the world, and arouse the conscience of mankind and the sensitive moral spirit of the world to this threat of Jewish extinction."

The World Union represents 800 Reform, Liberal, or Progressive synagogues in twenty centuries with a combined membership of more than 1,500,000. The largest body comes from the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (Reform) in North America which represents 670 congregations and one million members.

Proclaiming in sharp terms the need for world Jewry to speak out on behalf of Russian Jews, Dr. Shankman said, "We cannot be silent today. To do so, is to commit a grave moral sin." He pointed out that no group in Russia is subject more to the deprivation of so-called constitutional, ethnic, national, and minority rights than the Jews; nowhere is the false, hypocritical idealism of the Soviet system more blatantly manifest than in its treatment of the Jews; and that the USSR's policies and goal seem to be the total suppression and strangulation of any distinctive Jewish cultural, spiritual, or religious life.

The Jewish religious leader told the delegates that the Soviet government could persuade the world that it is a partner in the regeneration of mankind if it would heed the call echoed by humanitarian groups and leaders throughout the world to end the attritions against Jews.

Jews in the Soviet Union are considered primarily a nationality group and also a religious group. There has existed for a long time an extreme shortage of religious articles. No prayerbooks have been printed, and a Yeshiva, a seminary for the training of rabbinic students, has existed in name only for many years. Last year a group of Orthodox rabbis from the United States were told by Rabbi Yehudah Levin in Moscow that permission had been given by the authorities for the printing of a new prayer book and that the Yeshiva would be reopened for twenty rabbinic students. Up to now, nothing has been substantiated to indicate that either the prayer books are being printed or that the Yeshiva has been reopened.

Another nettling item evolves around the availability of matzohs (unleavened bread) during the Passover festival. Last year in some of the major cities like Moscow and Leningrad, adequate supplies appeared to be available. However, reports were received that in many other communities a short had still existed.

In addition, the Jewish community has no instrument within the Soviet Union to work together as an organizational group nor do they maintain any formal ties with Jewish bodies abroad. They have also never received permission to participate in international Jewish meetings outside of the Soviet Union. Both relations with other religious groups and attendance at such meetings have been granted to some of the other church bodies in the USSR like the Russian Orthodox, Baptists, and Moslems.

On a nationality level, Jews do not have schools to teach Jewish history and culture, such as those maintained by other nationality groups within the USSR. There also exist only in very small and limited quantities, Yiddish newspapers, books, and publications. The only monthly periodical, Sovietishe Heimland, prints 25,000 copies, most of which are sent abroad. Jews do not have any publishing houses.

Rabbi Shankman reported that the World Union's seven Israeli congregations and four rabbis were prepared to take legal steps to obtain full rights to perform their ministerial functions, such as marriages and funerals. He said that the laymen and rabbis in Israel had formed a National Progressive Religious Council and had won some support in the press from members of the Knesset (Parliament) and are ready now to demand and become embattled for recognition as Rabbis by Israel's Chief Rabbinate.

Rabbi Shankman said that the Liberal Israeli groups were now prepared to take legal action to make certain that their religious leaders would be granted equal rights with the Orthodox rabbinate to officiate at such functions as marriages, funerals, and service chaplains. He said that the convention would discuss these proposals at great length.

He added: "The World Union Rabbis have stood up heroically and unflinchingly against petty annoyances, political obstructionism, irritating and costly litigation, and even official religious opposition and hostility." Rabbi Shankman noted that the seven congregations were conducting regular religious services, holding religious school classes for young and adult, are engaged in extended youth activities, have lectured on Liberal Judaism at schools and Kibbutzim, and have printed their own siddur, mahzor, and haggadah (religious books).

"Our constituency in Israel must be granted the fundamental right of freedom of religion. We will not be satisfied with a second-rate Judaism and disabled rabbis. We do not tell the Israelis how to worship but we do demand rights for our progressive co-workers and we dare not be timid in thought, nor pusillanimous in action.

Mrs. Gandhi Pledges Aid For 400th-Year Celebration In Cochin, India

Sammy Koder saw the Prime Minister and there was joy among the eighty-five "white Jews" of Cochin, India. Shabdai Samuel Koder, a wealthy merchant and president of the South Indian Jewish Association, called on Prime Minister Indira Gandhi during her visit there, says the New York Times writer, J. Anthony Lukas.

In his two-minute interview, Mr. Koder told Mrs. Gandhi of his plans for a "very big show" in 1968 to celebrate the four-hundredth anniversary of the building of the Jewish synagogue in Cochin, a city about 670 miles south of Bombay.

"She said, 'I will give you my wholehearted support'," Mr. Koder related, recounting the conversation to a cluster of appreciative relatives and friends. Soon the word was all over the waterfront area where most of Cochin's "white Jews" live.

The Jews, some of them descendants of settlers who landed on Kerala's dazzling beaches in the first century A.D., were uneasy about Mr. Kodar's talk with the Prime Minister. They feared that Mrs. Gandhi might not give governmental backing to the planned celebrations because of strained relations between India and Israel.

Those relations, never very cordial, have cooled considerably in recent years as India assiduously

e Vocal In Support Of Right To Dissent

The right to protest and dissent from the Government's policy in Vietnam was strongly supported by Jewish organizations at the annual meeting of the National Community Relations Advisory Council in Washington.

But a resolution on this issue, which provoked heated debate, fell short of adoption when one of the eight national Jewish organizations affiliated with the Council objected to a portion, says Irving Spiegel, in the New York Times. The disputed portion said that action to stifle dissent "threatens to recreate the hysteria of the McCarthy period."

Representatives of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America argued that the statement wrongly implied the existence of a "so-called spirit of McCarthyism." They declared in a statement that while there was "widespread and heated" dissent over American policy in Vietnam, it was "almost completely free and uninhibited."

Under the Council's procedures, the veterans group exercised its right to veto the resolution. The Council is the coordinating body for eight Jewish national organizations and local community councils throughout the country engaged in intergroup activity and in combating anti-Semitism.

The seven other national groups signed the disputed resolution as a joint declaration from their organizations. Thirty-one local com-

MRS. GANDHI

woos the Arabs. Mrs. Gandhi's Government openly snubbed Israel's President, Zalman Shazar, when he visited Calcutta and New Delhi on the way to Nepal last spring.

There were some fears that she might withhold support for the celebration, which Mr. Koder hopes will attract Jews from all over the world. However, relieved by the meeting, Mr. Koder is preparing a formal request for Mrs. Gandhi to open the celebration, for the Government to issue a commemorative stamp, and to provide special facilities for foreign visitors, says the New York Times. He hopes that many New York Jews will come to the celebrations, perhaps aboard a chartered ship that could take them directly to this tropical port on the Arabian Sea.

"I know New York Jews are very interested in other Jewish communities and I'm sure they will be interested in ours," said Mr. Koder, who visited New York several years ago for a meeting of Rotary International.

"After all, we have been here for 1,900 years, which would make us one of the oldest Jewish communities anywhere outside Israel," he said.

Mr. Koder sadly concedes that the community's long history may be drawing to a close. In 1947, when India gained independence, there were 2,000 Jews in Kerala and 150 in Cochin. Today there are only 350 in the state, about 100 of them in Cochin. Most of those who have left have gone to Israel.

The sharpest decline has come among the so-called "black Jews," persons of native Dravidian stock whose ancestors were slaves for the Jewish settlers and were converted by them. In 1947 there were about 1,000 black Jews in Kerala. Today there are about 200.

Black Jews are now allowed to worship in the small white-plaster synagogue at the end of the Jewish area's only street. But they still do not have the right to read some sections of the Holy Scriptures, says the New York Times.

The white Jewish community follows Orthodox ritual. Its members will not marry Hindus, although a few have married their converted former slaves.

The statement deplored "all action which threatens expression of dissent in connection with United States foreign policy, particularly in the case of Vietnam war; or to discredit such expressions by the propagandistic association of dissent with the most bizarre, disreputable, or unpatriotic elements in society."

Further, the statement declared, "such action threatens to recreate the hysteria of the McCarthy period, which happily we overcame." The disputed resolution confined itself to the issue of dissent and did not express any position on American policy in Vietnam.

It said that "in this period of crisis opposing views on basic issues of peace and war are more freely being expressed than in comparable wartime periods of American history."

The statement was signed by the American Jewish Congress; Bnai Brith and its Anti-Defamation League; the Jewish Labor Committee; Union of American Hebrew Congregations, United Synagogue of America, Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, and National Council of Jewish Women.

In its dissent, the Jewish War Veterans said that critics of the Government's Vietnam policy "should debate the issue on its merits, and should not cry 'foul' when the debate becomes heated on both sides, so long as there are no acts of repression or retaliation," reports the New York Times. The Council's groups unanimously expressed their opposition to proposed constitutional amendments that would permit Bible reading and prayer recitation as "devotional exercises in the public schools."

By Marguerite Morel, in Jewish Affairs

Grandpa Joseph was soon to celebrate his birthday. "Seventy-eight, bless him!" exclaimed everyone.

But the problem of the present seemed insoluble.

"What are we going to choose for Gramps?" was the oft-repeated query that echoed through the house for weeks; first uttered in tones of pleasant anticipation, finally voiced with near despair.

In terms of utility or beauty there was simply very little left, that could convey adequately the love for him, in the hearts of his children and grandchildren. Happily, many years of birthdays and anniversaries, New Year good wishes and often quite flimsy pretexts, had all served to decimate a meagre stock of new ideas.

The family sat around night after night, struggling vainly to produce a spark of inspiration to fire their dull imaginations.

A hesitant, "slippers?", was ventured in a small voice — quickly silenced by disdainful glares.

The daughter of the house looked up from the chill of Bleak House: "a muffler!", she said, decisively. This provoked hoots of derision.

"Just dandy for a December afternoon in Durban!" volunteered Davis, twanging his guitar, "How about some ties?" he went on, "Yeah Yeah, some snappy ties."

It was felt that Gramps might not really 'dig' a beatle-bow.

"I kno-o-w", from Jamie, with all the wonder of a great discover in his seven-year-old voice — "let's buy him a puppy!"

Hands were thrown up in mock-horror to shrieks of "Grannie's carpets!"

It was all too difficult.

Recordings of well-known chazonim? — usually reserved for the festivals. Books? — not again! He was a non-smoker . . .

"Daddy, Daddy, what shall we buy Grandpa?" piped the youngest.

A disembodied voice floated over the top of the newspaper, "I rather fancy a croquet-set," it said.

There was a hush while this revolutionary idea was digested; then a free-for-all ensued. No, he was definitely not joking and was quite undeterred by an atmosphere heavy with sarcasm.

In due course a triumphant father arrived home with an impressively large parcel, suitably wrapped in bright paper and tied with festive ribbons. Unruffled by the innuendoes about a 'second childhood', he would affectionately pat the offending article in passing, while it was ostentatiously ignored by the rest of the family.

And ultimately of course, he was justifiably smug, Gramps was delighted with the present. In fact, Grandpa said:

"Your gift means three important things to me. In the first place it is happy proof that, thank God, I do not lack the necessities of life; then it indicates that I have earned the leisure to enjoy quiet days, surrounded by all the beauty of His wondrous creation; finally it implies that I am not really growing old, at all."

It was a sweet defeat.

HEAD OF WORLD UNION

"We shall advise our Rabbis to work patiently and creatively, to build their congregations, and teach their children, and through the spoken and written word ever widen the understanding and meaning of Progressive Judaism; we shall support and encourage their efforts on the firing line; but for the sake of the peace of Jerusalem we shall not be silent."

Rabbi Shankman called the movement's advancements in South America small but promising. However from all parts of the continent comes the cry: "Send us rabbis, lecturers, teachers, educational materials, and religious texts." He said this challenge was heightened by the alarming reports of the vast numbers of Jewish students deserting Judaism and gravitating towards radical economic and ideological movements. They know nothing about Judaism except the Orthodoxy which they have rejected or identification with Israel which is insufficient for their survival."

"In the face of these circumstances and of the ever-present danger of an increasingly explosive political situation, our feeble, faltering efforts must be intensified and accelerated. It is regrettable that the World Union's efforts were impeded by an acute shortage of funds and man-power. If we had the money we could establish literally dozens of congregations in Israel and Latin America and even here in Europe."

In Europe, Dr. Shankman cited the launching of two new Liberal Congregational groups in Brussels and Geneva. He also expressed encouragement from the increased activities of European Jewish youth groups, even in Germany, who profess a tremendous interest in discussions which search for a meaningful and relevant Judaism in the contemporary world."

over. The injured constable, Duane Hendricks, 22, 10 months on the force, was being lifted when, several blocks away, the boy in the stolen car was arrested due to Benny's call.

PC Hendricks had a compound fracture of his right leg and ankle. After months in hospital and more at home with his wife, Donna, and their child, he was allowed to return to light duties in 12 Division only this week.

His leg still isn't right. But he'll be able to limp down to City Hall tomorrow at 2 p.m. when the Board of Police Commissioners will present Benny Stark with a citation for his good citizenship on that December morning on Maria Street.

That'll make twice for Benny at City Hall this week. Today City Council is to consider a zoning change (C3 to C4) that, if approved by the Ontario Municipal Board, will give him a good new nearby site for his scrapyard — which the city expropriated last year due to complaints from Benny's neighbors.

JEWISH WELFARE BOARD

Centers, he successfully persuaded the leadership of JWB that its job was not over.

He pointed out that the problems of demobilization required the continuation of JWB's efforts and that beyond that there would be need for the experience JWB had acquired and the manpower and resources it had developed. He understood in 1918 that many of the Jewish communities which had become conscious of their own recreational and cultural needs through service to Jewish men in military camps would want to retain these services for themselves and their youth. Thus he set the stage for the merger of JWB and the National Council of YMHAs in 1921.

It is significant that the report recommending the merger to the National Council's convention in 1920 was made by Schiff's son-in-law, Felix M. Warburg. Thus Schiff's interest in and support of JWB's dual program was handed on to his descendants. Just as his son, Mortimer, was one of the key figures in JWB during World War I, so his daughter, Mrs. Felix M. Warburg, became one of its leaders between the wars and in the years that followed. His grandson, John Schiff, headed JWB's Armed Services Division at the outbreak of World War II.

Neither JWB nor the Center movement established any memorial to Jacob H. Schiff. None was needed. The Jewish Community Center movement, which under the leadership of JWB, has become a dynamic force for the kind of Judaism Schiff believed in, is in a broad sense one of his living memorials. So too is JWB's world-wide program of religious and morale service to Jewish military personnel, which he helped to launch fifty years ago.

WORLD JEWISH CONGRESS ASSEMBLY TO INCLUDE DISCUSSION OF GERMAN-JEWISH RELATIONS

The decision of the World Jewish Congress to include a special symposium on "Germans And Jews" at its forthcoming plenary assembly in Brussels, is based upon the belief that open and frank discussion of this difficult and delicate problem is necessary, Dr. Nahum Goldmann, president of the World Jewish Congress, declared in a statement reviewing the major issues the world Jewish body faces today.

Between 400 and 500 Jewish leaders from all parts of the world will gather in Brussels for the 10-day meeting which begins on the evening of July 31. Dr. Goldmann stated that there was a reasonable chance that representatives of Eastern European Jewries will participate as observers, after many years of absence from meetings of the World Jewish Congress. The WJC president said that delegations from most of the countries would be larger than on previous occasions.

He welcomed the fact that the Conference of Major Jewish Organizations in America, representing the overwhelming majority of the Jewish community in the United States, will be represented by an important delegation, participating as observers but with the right to take part in the debates and commissions. This added to the representative character of the Assembly.

There will be a number of symposia on the central questions of Jewish life of today, such as "Jewish Values And Challenges"; "Human Rights"; "Peace And Disarmament"; with competent speakers, both Jewish and non-Jewish, in each of these discussions.

Of the symposium on "Germans And Jews," the World Jewish Congress leader stated: "It has caused some doubts and many misunderstandings. The leadership of the World Jewish Congress regards the open and frank discussion of this difficult and delicate problem as necessary, just because the problem is far from being solved, despite the indemnification payments and the normalization of relations between Israel and the German Federal Republic.

"After what happened in the Hitler period, it is obvious that it will take quite some time until German-Jewish relations will be psychologically and spiritually normalized, and recent symptoms of a new anti-Semitically colored nationalism in Germany have given cause to worries and fears. On the other hand, to ignore this problem and not to take note of Germany's growing importance is a most unrealistic attitude, based on pure emotionalism.

"The purpose of the discussion in Brussels, in which prominent German and Jewish leaders will participate, is to analyze the complexity and the difficulties of the problem, and to make the German people aware that merely material restitution cannot solve the question, and that they must continue to make serious efforts to avoid any resurgence of neo-Nazi or anti-Semitic tendencies and to eradicate old traditions of racial discrimination and anti-Jewish prejudices.

"The frank discussion of the problem by eminent Jewish and German personalities will indicate the importance of this question which will, for quite some time, remain on the agenda of the Jewish and the German peoples and may contribute to its clarification and to a gradual constructive solution."

Participants in the German symposium will be: Dr. Eugen Gerstenmaier, president of the Parliament of the German Federal Republic; Professor Golo Mann, of Kilchberg-Zurich; Prof. Salo Baron, of New York; and Prof. Gershon Sholem, of Jerusalem.

Dr. Goldmann expressed the view that the Brussels Conference promised "to become the most important one in the history of the WJC, both by its composition and by its agenda."

ALLIED WAR CRIMES COMMISSION IS AUTHORITY FOR ESTIMATE OF MURDERS COMMITTED BY NAZIS

By Peter Lust, of Beaconsfield, Quebec

The following appeared as a letter to the Montreal Star:

Your correspondent Jack Auer questions the correctness of the number of Nazi victims and feels that anyone who is able to prove the number of six million killed should come forward and substantiate the figure. The number of Nazi victims has been substantiated by a great amount of evidence; the most thorough research was made by the War Crimes Commission, on whose findings the prosecution of the Nuremberg trials was based.

This information gives evidence of the following number of Nazi victims: For the major camps (Auschwitz, Sobibor, Belzec, Treblinka, Majdanek, Chelmno, Struthof, and Natzweiler): 5,426,800 victims; murdered by Einsatztruppen and special Wehrmacht and Waffen-SS units in Poland and the U.S.S.R.: 1,110,600 victims. Total number of victims: 6,537,400, the figure of six million is therefore somewhat lower than the actual number of murder victims.

The International Red Cross is well aware of the figures; it has in some instances helped to compile them, particularly relating to the camps of Natzweiler, Struthof, and Neuengamme.

Mr. Auer then questions the war guilt of Hitler for the outbreak of the Second World War.

The transcript of the meetings of the German General Staff of June 14 and June 16, 1939, shows the carefully prepared blueprint of aggression both against the West and against the East. During the latter meeting Hitler stated: "I alone will bear the full responsibility for this war, and for the final victory." Fortunately, history changed this desired victory into total defeat.

The Neo-Nazis of Germany (and they have recently won almost ten per cent of all votes in several vital elections) have constantly tried to play down the number of murder victims. "It is not true that we have killed six and a half million Jews. We killed only two million," was the statement recently printed in the neo-Nazi newspaper, "Deutsche National – und Soldatenzeitung", of Munich. Actually, the Nazis killed some six and a half million Jews, and some fifteen million non-Jews, and I believe that we should also remember the non-Jewish victims of Nazism. The largest part of these murders occurred in the Soviet Union, Poland, and the other occupied Eastern countries.

I will concur with one single statement of Mr. Auer:

While the war guilt of the Nazi government is overwhelming, the Western allies also share some of the guilt for the outbreak of the Second World War: Their guilt is one of omission:

When the Hitler government occupied the Rhineland in 1936 in clear violation of the provisions of the Versailles treaty, the allied powers should at once have entered Germany, arrested the Nazi leaders, put them on trial and hanged them after conviction.

At that time the Nazis were still weak, and the thirty million people killed in the second world war (to the twenty million murder victims must be added ten million soldiers who lost their lives) would still be alive.

Eventually the Nazi criminals had to be tried and hanged anyway – ten years later. It if had been done ten years sooner, the world would have been much better off.

The Spiritual Father Of The Jewish Welfare Board, His Living Memorial

BY BERNARD POSTAL

It was on the third day of Passover, April 9, 1917, just three days after the United States entered World War I, that American Jewry created a new national organization at the request of the United States Government. Its name was the National Jewish Welfare Board, which this year begins the observance of its fiftieth anniversary.

It is not known who first conceived the idea of establishing a representative coordinated body to serve as the united agency of the Jewish community in meeting the religious, welfare, and morale needs of Jewish military personnel during World War I. JWB, as the organization became known almost from its inception fifty years ago, was the product of many minds and hearts. But there is plenty of evidence that its "spiritual father" was Jacob H. Schiff.

Schiff's deep concern with educating Jewish youth to an awareness of and appreciation for the cultural traditions of the Jewish people brought him into the orbit of JWB services to youth, in and out of uniform. No American Jew did more for Jewish education and scholarship in this country than Jacob H. Schiff. The roster of the educational projects and institutions that owe their establishment on a sound and lasting footing to his generosity is virtually a roll-call of many of the great landmarks of Jewish learning.

His personal reverence for Jewish traditions and his keen and life-long interest in the welfare of young people made him one of the earliest supporters of the YMHA movement. Schiff had been in the United States barely more than a decade when he interested himself in the New York YMHA. In 1876 he became a member of its board because he saw in the program of this oldest existing Jewish Community Center the promise of a Jewish education awakening among the youth of the city.

During its first two decades, the New York YMHA had difficulty winning community support but when Schiff came to its support in 1898 it soon achieved a significant place in the life of New York Jewry. Until that time the Y had occupied shabby rented quarters. After Schiff gave the Y its first building, the Y's program expanded. So impressed was Schiff with the Y's growth and with its service to Jewish youth, that before the year was out he announced a gift of a much larger building at Lexington Avenue and 92nd Street. Opening in 1900, this building became a landmark in the history of the Center movement. When the present building was erected on the same site in 1929, Mrs. Jacob H. Schiff laid the cornerstone.

Schiff was one of the first to recognize the great future of the Center movement. In 1884 he provoked a heated debate at the convention of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations by his vigorous insistence that the Union's constitution be amended to admit the growing number of YMHAs to "membership on a proper basis." To the objection that the Union was a body of synagogues and that the inclusion of YMHAs would permit them to outnumber synagogues, Schiff retorted, "The YMHAs are better missionaries than nine tenths of the congregations."

Referring to the 92nd Street Y, he described it as "a pattern association" of which "there are many throughout the country . . . Why should they not have a voice when congregations of smaller number are represented in the Union?" When Schiff made this proposal the Union had 130 synagogues affiliated with it, but there were already nearly as many YMHAs.

In 1905, when New York's Jewish community was considering the formation of a federation of Jewish charities, Schiff lent the full weight of his prestige and support to those who felt that Jewish youth organizations, and particularly YMHAs, merited full community support. "There is absolutely no reason why," he said, "larger provision should be made for the orphan than for the religious education and moral welfare of the juvenile."

Two years later he again focused public attention on the developing Jewish Community Center when he suggested the creation of a national association of YMHAs. There had been two short-lived federations of Ys in the 1880s and 1890s. In a letter to Percival Menken, president of the 92nd Street YMHA, Schiff wrote: "It has occurred to me that there should be formed a national league of Young Men's Hebrew Associations. There is now, I believe, in almost every large town in the United States, a YMHA, and I believe if these associations could be gotten in close touch with each other, much could be done to promote Jewish life among the younger generation of American Israelites."

Schiff's idea was most opportune. Between 1907 and 1910 five regional associations of YMHAs came into being and the membership of all YMHAs was nearly 25,000. In 1912, Schiff's son-in-law, Felix M. Warburg, who was then president of the 92nd Street YMHA, called a national conference of 75 prominent Jewish leaders to create what Schiff had suggested five years earlier. On November 2, 1913, delegates from 65 YM and YWHAs, meeting in New York City, established the National Council of Young Men's Hebrew and Kindred Associations. Schiff was named one of the three trustees of this first permanent national association of Jewish Community Centers, an office he retained until his death in 1920.

It was the Army and Navy Committee of this National Council of Young Men's Hebrew and Kindred Associations, brought into being through the foresight of Schiff, that convened the first meeting that led to the founding of JWB in 1917. Not until the end of World War I did Schiff actually hold any office in JWB but he, together with Louis Marshall, Judge Irving Lehman, and Dr. Cyrus Adler were the principal factors in planning and programming the new organization. Schiff's son, Mortimer H. Schiff, became one of the most active figures in JWB in his own right but he also represented and reflected the views of his distinguished father.

Once JWB was firmly established and had received official recognition from the United States Government, the elder Schiff saw to it that the organization had no financial problems.

As chairman of the New York City Committee of the American Jewish Relief Committee, he suggested that some of the funds raised by this committee be earmarked for JWB. This brought in $1,000,000. Later he sent a telegram to 200 Jewish communities asking their support for JWB. This yielded another million.

The same outlook that motivated his interest in the Jewish Community Centers moved him to do everything possible to provide for the religious needs of young people in uniform.

Before the first Jewish military chaplains were appointed, Schiff took a personal hand, together with Dr. Adler, in completing the arrangements for sending a JWB mission to France to promote religious activities for Jews on active duty there. In the closing months of the war Schiff became one of the leaders of the national interfaith campaign to raise funds for JWB, the Knights of Columbus, the YMCA, and the Salvation Army, all of which were engaged in morale service to the military.

Two weeks after the end of World War I hostilities, Schiff came before the annual meeting of JWB and made one of his rare speeches. With the same kind of vision that enabled him to suggest the establishment of JWB's predecessor in the field of service to

Nazi Victims: Surely Justice And Humanity Demand A Fresh Approach

The following appeared as a letter to the London, England, Times from Sir John Foster, Q.C., M.P. for Norwich, and others:

Many who recall the inhuman treatment meted out to victims of Nazi persecution, particularly to those from eastern Europe, will feel profound disquiet at the terms of the Final Law on Indemnification passed last year by the Federal German Parliament followed by the Budgetary Security Act (Haushaltssicherungsgesetz).

In the history of compensation, Poles, Yugoslavs, and others persecuted on grounds of nationality have consistently been treated as second-class citizens and, compared with Nazi victims persecuted on grounds of race, religion and ideology, have suffered severe discrimination.

The Final Law has done little or nothing to redress the balance. "National Persecutees" still suffer harsh discrimination in regard to disablement and heritability of claims. They receive nothing for loss of property, loss of freedom, loss of economic or professional status, and no relief from the hardship fund which is available to other victims. In addition, the Budgetary Security Law recently passed will defer in many cases the full discharge of claims until 1968 – a crushing blow to victims who have already waited twenty years.

A serious omission in the Indemnification Law is the absence of any recognition of the rights of those resistance workers (whose offences were limited to listening to foreign broadcasts or distributing leaflets) to present claims, thereby nullifying a statement of the Deputy Chancellor in 1949 admitting that their right to present claims had been contractually undertaken by the Federal Republic in agreement with the Three Allied Powers.

Where the law does make a concession in extending the period within which those refugees previously excluded by the dateline of October, 1953, can claim refugee status, it is foreseen that the following rates of compensation will be paid:–

|---|---|
| Permanent Damage to Health | |
| 25-49 per cent | DM.3,000 (£267 approx.) |
| 50-69 per cent | DM.4,500 (£301 approx.) |
| 70 per cent upwards | DM.6,000 (£535 approx.) |

If Germany claims to have regained her status as a Rechtstaat, can these figures support the claim?

Surely justice and humanity demand a fresh approach to this question.

Yours faithfully,
John Foster.

A GONG FOR BENNY STARK

By Scott Young, in the Toronto Globe and Mail

About 10.30 a.m. last December 15 Benny Stark was sitting in the old parlor of the converted house he uses for an office at the front of his scrapyard on Maria Street. It has been expropriated but he is still around. Business had been going full bore since before 8 a.m. but Benny had been late, leaving his foreman with the bankroll to pay the yard's loyal clients for their old batteries and bathtubs and copper wire.

Now the foreman tossed the money onto a desk and Benny was counting it. I think if a ruggedly handsome character actor came here from the concentration camps of Europe and fought his way up in the junk business from day laborer to successful owner (his daughter drives a Mustang), he'd wind up looking like Benny. His thick wavy hair is brushed straight back. He has a good laugh and a heavily accented voice that on clear days can be heard all the way to City Hall.

He was counting the money when he heard a car approaching at high speed. Zip! – it was by, eastbound on the narrow old street. Close behind sped a policeman on a three-wheeled motorcycle. Almost instantly came a terrible crash.

Benny threw the money from him. It scattered on the desk and floor. He ran to the window and looked east. He could see wheels spinning in the air, a man caught underneath. Maria Street jogs sharply to the right about 100 feet past Benny's scrapyard and the wreck was there. His front door is always locked so he ran out the side. Five or six men were in the back of the cavernous scrapyard shed. He shouted, "Go to the cellar and get my big jack that will lift cars and follow me! Man hurt!"

The men were on the run as Benny turned and sprinted east on Maria. He saw now that the motorcycle had crashed. The car being chased had escaped. The motorcycle engine was running, ignition on, gasoline running over everything, an ideal setup for an explosion. The policeman was pinned on the ground, screaming with pain.

Benny reached over first and turned off the ignition. Then he picked up the police radio microphone. This was a citizen calling, he said. He gave the policeman's number (he leaned over to read this) and said the officer was badly hurt. The police radio blared from the silent motorcycle into the Maria Street morning to tell Benny that help was on the way.

Citizen Stark once took the first-aid course given by the St. John Ambulance Association. He did what he could now and tried to keep the officer talking. Who had he been chasing? The policeman was in his early twenties, burly, nearly 200 pounds. One leg was badly broken but there was nothing the matter with his mind. He told Benny he'd been chasing a boy in a stolen car. He gave the boy's name, the make of car, and the license number. Benny picked up the police radio and relayed this information, including the direction possibilities.

Then suddenly Maria Street was swarming with help. The police took
